China says Tibet access is restricted because some foreigners get altitude sickness

March 08, 2019

Talking to journalists on the side-lines of the National People's Congress annual meeting in Beijing on March 6, Wu Yingjie, TAR Party Secretary, said that the region remained open to foreigners but restrictions were necessary because some visitors suffered from altitude sickness. Tibet, he said, welcomes foreign tourists and media and travel restrictions are imposed by the government to ensure their safety. He also criticised the Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act passed by the United States in December, saying it "totally does not tally with the facts" and "had seriously interfered in China's internal affairs". Wu Yingjie added "There have been many Americans [visiting] Tibet in recent years. After considering the special geographical and climatic conditions, we adopted a series of regulations on foreigners entering Tibet in accordance with the law." Wu Yingjie said many foreign visitors were "grateful" for the arrangements but "some Americans seem to have this on their mind and I have found that to be really odd". Wu Yingjie also denied there were extra restrictions on foreign journalists, insisting they were welcome as long as they followed the proper procedures. He also rejected the suggestion that Tibetans supported the Dalai Lama, saying “The Dalai Lama has not brought the Tibetan people any good. While there may be some support for him internationally, Tibetans are very thankful for the prosperity brought to them by the Communist Party.”

Tibetan religious activity slashed, Lhasa mayor confirms

Just days before the 60th anniversary of Tibet’s uprising against Beijing’s rule, Go Khok, the Mayor of Lhasa on the sidelines of the NPC session in Beijing on March 7, said in Tibet the number of days spent observing religious events, and the number of people attending them, had both been reduced to less than 10 per cent. He told a room of Tibetan delegates and journalists in the Great Hall of the People “In 2018, Lhasa ... took a clear-cut stand in eliminating the negative influence the Dalai Lama exerted via religion and took great effort in ridding the passive religious influence. Based on the premise that believers’ religious needs were met, the number of days major religious activities were held and the number of people attending them both reduced to below 10 per cent.” Repeated calls to the Tibetan delegation’s press officer for clarification went unanswered. According to the 2010 census, 76.7 per cent of Lhasa residents are Tibetans. According to Tsering Woesser, a Tibetan poet and writer living in Beijing “These restrictions have been in place for years, and are very specific”. Retired party cadres, civil servants and other public employees are all banned from attending religious activities, with offenders risking reduced pensions, salaries or even dismissal. Students, from primary schools to universities, are also banned from the activities, Woesser said. “As a result, the number of believers taking part in religious activities nowadays is far fewer than before ... but this is only the appearance. The belief Tibetans – including the young people – hold towards Buddhism and the Dalai Lama are not only prevalent, but unflinching.”

Go Khok said maintaining stability would be a key task for the city government this year, because of the anniversary. He said the city had been doubling down on its so-called “grid management system”. Go Khok also said the government had “appointed specially assigned people to follow, serve and manage key Muslim targets who headed overseas”, without elaborating.

Chinese internet service provider and telecom giant Huawei has set up three 5G stations in the Tibetan Autonomous Region, near the Indian border in what is being called a fortification of Chinese government infrastructure by experts. Chinese state media Xinhua reported that on March 1, Chinese telecom giant China Mobile launched the first 5G base station in Lhasa. Government owned China Mobile which has partnered with Huawei has two additional 5G base stations in Lhasa. The newly opened station's outdoor terminal tests offered an average internet speed of some 500 Mbps that is capable of downloading a 1GB file in only two seconds, said China Mobile's Tibet branch. The 5G network labelled a 'game changer' in the tech and telecommunications world is 10 to 100 times faster than 4G LTE networks. The Chinese company has said that the new network is aimed at linking TAR with the rest of China and to enable farmers and locals to have advanced and modern communication services for overall economic development. However, internet and security experts have said that the stations will act as arms to Chinese military and offensive infrastructure in the region that borders India. "As a number of Chinese defence academics and engineers have postulated, 5G could improve battlefield communications with faster and more stable information transmission, increasing the timeliness and integration of information," said Elsa B Kania, an adjunct fellow at the Center for a New American Security in the US.
